FRANCE'S STRENGTH

American comment on the crisis which the Daladier government survived last Wednesday runs to the effect that France is playing into the hands of its enemies; that Frenchmen must settle down and pull together.

From this distance it looks as though France, by behaving like a democracy, is confessing weakness in the face of Germany's totalitarian strength. The redeeming feature of the situation is that, temporarily at least, the French seem to have turned toward moderation.

Yet, from the viewpoint of those who believe in the democratic method, the fact France is enduring one of the trials of democracy—the opposition of a determined minority—does not furnish a motive for misgivings, but rather a basis for further criticism of authoritarian rule in Germany.

There has been and is continuing to be a crisis in the reich, also. It is being dealt with by a government which tolerates no opposition, a government which cannot be voted out of power, a government which cannot fall because it is answerable to nothing but itself. True, that government has managed to give an appearance of unity and to create an impression of extraordinary strength.

But to the extent that the strength is due to concentration of political authority in one man, to the extent that it has not been created by the joint efforts of many men using their judgment, it is an illusion. Surface appearances can be deceiving. Lack of dissension may be a sign of weakness. There yet may come a time when Frenchmen, having had their say and vented their animosity, will be stronger for the experience than their neighbors to the west, to whom the privileges of thought and debate are forbidden.

THE NEWEST EMERGENCY

The most popular thing in the United States to talk about at the moment, next to Christmas, is national defense, up to and including the continent of South America. Politicians are taking the cue.

None of them dares to say anything against national defense, of course. Nevertheless, the outline of an issue is beginning to appear. How much national defense should there be?

The answer is obvious only to those interested exclusively in national defense. As far as they're concerned, there's no issue. There should be as much defense as the army and navy think is necessary.

Elsewhere, another answer is being given. Some think there should be as much defense as certain economic planners consider necessary for the purpose of creating a war boom.

Reliable Washington commentators are reporting that some of the administration's left wing supporters are trying to turn the national defense program into a new lending-spending drive—a fourth new deal equipped with a new emergency and a new slogan. There is danger, in other words, of confusing money spent for defense and money spent for pump priming in the name of national defense. Fortunately, the danger has been spotted in plenty of time to deal with it. Military men are beginning to tell what actually is needed; politicians are beginning to show interest in regaining control over federal spending; the general public is beginning to look twice at deficit expenditures.

A NICE, ROUND FIGURE

The depression cost the United States $132,000,000,000, says Isador Lubin, commissioner of labor statistics. It's in order to wonder whether Mr. Lubin ever played football.

In football, experts point out, a team with plenty of zip, including a good passing game, can go like a house afire till it gets inside the 10-yard line. The defense is at a disadvantage.

At that point, the defense has an advantage, because it is more compactly organized. Many a good offense bogs down at the goal line for this reason, say the experts.

In 1929 the United States was going like a house afire. It was, in the opinion of many of its leading figures, on the verge of scoring a touchdown. But when it got inside the 10-yard line, its razzle-dazzle quit working.

Mr. Lubin like most statisticians, probably is a pushover for a nice, round figure. Unquestionably $132,000,000,000 is a nice, round figure. It would be interesting to know, though, if he'd say that a football team which had moved up to within 10 yards of a touchdown by gaining 60 yards in six plays had lost 60 yards because on the next six plays it couldn't gain anything when the opposition started to get in its best kicks.

SNUBS FOR STREAMLINERS

Recalling ambassadors to pass the time of day with them is the newest wrinkle in diplomacy. The German situation has been getting all the attention, but the United States has done the same thing in Russia.

The Moscow post has stood vacant since Ambassador Joseph E. Davies was transferred to Brussels last June. The Soviet has let it be known that Ambassador Alexander A. Troyanovsky, who left Washington on leave, will not come back till the United States sends an ambassador to Moscow.

The absent treatment is the streamlined way of showing displeasure and disapproval. It serves the same purpose as an open break in diplomatic relations, but has the advantage of making a resumption of relations possible without formal negotiations. It is in complete harmony with an era whose statesmen invented the undeclared war as an instrument of national policy.

DISAGREE ON RULING

WASHINGTON, Dec. 6—Organized labor's warring factions disagreed today over the probable effect of a supreme court decision that the national labor board had erred by invalidating an AFL contract.

While AFL leaders joyfully acclaimed the decision as an important triumph in the factional dispute, a spokesman for the rival CIO contended it would not necessarily prevent invalidation of similar contracts in the future.

A majority of the court decided yesterday that the labor board improperly had ordered abrogation of a collective bargaining contract between the Consolidated Edison company and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (AFL).

At the same time, however, the court declared the board had jurisdiction over the labor relations of companies like the big New York utility, which, although operating in only one state, sells its product to concerns engaged in interstate commerce.

The portion of the decision relating to the contract was the first direct reversal given the labor board in a formal supreme court opinion.

Charles Fahy, general counsel for the labor board, contended the section was "decided on an extremely narrow ground, was one of procedure and does not affect the board's right to act on such contracts."

William Green, president of the AFL, asserted the decision would force the board to reverse itself in all cases in which "it has illegally abrogated contracts entered into between employers and AFL unions."

"The supreme court has knocked the props out from under the board's arbitrary, prejudicial and grossly unfair position toward the AFL with regard to union contracts," he said.

Lee Pressman, general counsel of the CIO, said the decision "can give but cold comfort to labor organizations seeking to advance themselves at the cost of the workers by obtaining preferential treatment from employers."

(The CIO and the AFL have been at odds over the Wagner act and its administration. The AFL wants to amend the statute, but the CIO contends it should not be changed.)

THE STARS SAY:

For Wednesday, December 7

A VERY lively day is presaged by the ruling planetary configurations. The energies are keyed to hard work, important objectives and a worthy attention to details and constructive effort. This may incite some rather surprising situations, in which sudden moves or changes may be brought about by the intervention of elders, superiors or those willing to assist in developing meritorious projects.

Those whose birthday it is may be prepared for a very active year in which really sound and practical plans and objectives may enlist the support of elders, superiors or other influential personages. A wise attention to details and a disposition to make needed revisions or changes of plans and methods of procedure will be of benefit. Otherwise, there may be friction.

A child born on this day, talented in unusual ways, with ability for details, may be practical and constructive, thus winning the support of important persons or elders.

Part of New York's "El" Passes

The "El" in operation in olden days

After 60 years New York's Sixth avenue elevated passes out of existence, to be replaced in 1940 by a subway. Few recall the "El" when it was hauled by steam locomotives. Here's a picture, printed through the courtesy of the Museum of the City of New York, showing the "El" in the old days, with a steam locomotive hauling a load uptown.

Mechanics Of The Human Eye Are Very Complicated

By LOGAN CLENDENING, M. D.
I HAVE at different times in this column discussed the diseases of the eye in a good deal of detail. Today I want to talk about things that are not immediately practical—the peculiarities of the sense of vision.

Vision is created by light striking on the retina of the eye. If we lived in a dark world, we would never have developed this remarkable organ, the retina. It is made up of probably the most complicated nerve cells in the entire body.

Dr. Clendening will answer questions of general interest only, and then only through his column.

These cells, stimulated by light, carry an impulse of some kind to a special part of the brain where it is translated into form, color and light itself. And yet, this is only part of the mystery of the mechanics of the eye.

For instance, the eye has to automatically close or open the pupil so that exactly the right amount of light comes in. It has to lengthen or shorten the lens so that an object is in focus. Every photographer has learned the trouble that he gets into from similar needs of accommodation with his iris and his distance, and he has had to employ all kinds of gadgets to help him out. Yet, the eye does all of this automatically.

The cells in the retina are of various kinds. Among them, named from their shape, are rods and cones. The present theory is that the cones are stimulated both by light and color perceptions, while the rods perceive only light itself and have nothing to do with color.

All of this, of course, leads to various difficulties. The color-blind person has probably some disease of the cones of his eye, the rods being intact.

Also, continued action of light makes anatomical changes in the retina; apparently so do certain chemicals or, rather, the lack of them. After staying in a bright light for a while, it can be seen that changes have occurred in the appearance of the retina, and when you first go into a dark theatre or a dark room, you are not able to see anything. This is temporary night blindness. Permanent night blindness occurs from lack of vitamin A in the food. So we have both physical and chemical factors working on the cells of the retina.

The sensitivity of the eye varies in various people, not only to color but to light, brilliance and rapidity of accommodation. There are 80 theories of color vision, all built on the assumption of the presence of a photo-sensitive substance.

The sensation of light produced by radiant energy impinging on the retina consists of two factors—brightness and color. Color is dependent on the wave length, brightness on the intensities of the light rays. Three qualities are considered to enter into the sensation of vision:

(1) Brilliance is the attribute of any color in respect to which it may be classed as equivalent to some member of a series of grays, ranging between black and white. A synonymous term is "brightness", or in the artist's sense, "value".

(2) Hue is that attribute of certain colors in respect to which they differ characteristically from the gray of the same brilliance and which permits them to be classed as reddish, yellowish, greenish or bluish. The hue is determined by the wave length.

(3) Saturation is that attribute of all colors possessing a hue, which determines their degree of difference from a gray of the same brilliance. Synonymous terms are "purity" and "chroma".

CHAPTER XV

It was the 6 o'clock boat. Margaret sat up front, on the upper deck, enjoying the first evening of the season. The boat was quiet. It wasn't until they were standing, and the boat was moving into the pier, that she noticed the sunbrowned young man ahead of her. She stared, and he turned.

"Margaret!"

"Kenny.... But how—when—?"

"Just now. Just off the boat. Which way are you going, home?"

He nodded, and he took her arm and they went down the runway and toward the waiting train. "I'm home, too. Surprise the folks. They don't know I'm coming."

She was breathing more naturally now, and he was beginning to feel his embarrassment. It occurred to both of them that things were decidedly awkward.

"Well," he said. She knew that he was going to say something about looking for a fellow in the smoker, and leave her.

"Come and sit with me and tell me all about it!"

She hurried ahead and he followed with his heavy suitcase. When they were seated in the car, he said, "Kenny—this is funny! I was supposed to be mad at each other—and I forgot and spoke to you. Stay mad at anyone who's been my best friend, so we'll stay as well bury the hatchet."

"Kiss and make up and everything," he agreed, grinning nervously. But he felt better. He wiped his forehead. "So Sue told you."

"Naturally. She was SO upset. She'll be alive again, now that you're back. She knows, of course?"

He wrinkled uneasily. "No—no. I haven't yet. The fact is, well, with one thing and another, I was more or less let out."

"Oh, Kenny, your wonderful job. I because Decker—"

"Well, to be frank, it wasn't only that. It brought it to a head, you might say. You were really right about it, Margaret. It wasn't the man who is a big shot here is just another dance partner there. I wish I'd never gone. But, of course, it was good experience. I'm going in with a different outfit."

"Sue will be glad anyway."

"Maybe. It puts me on a spot, though. She's so intense, and she wants to get married right away, and gosh, Maggie, how can I? I haven't even a job, unless I go to work with my father, and that's the last thing I want to do—go in to grocery business."

"Oh, Sue will win her dad over. Let him settle something on her."

"Maybe. But it doesn't look much like it now."

Margaret looked at him. Good heavens, he meant it. He WANTED the Deckers to settle something on Sue.

Feeling sick again, she leaned back tired in her seat, and watched the marshy idyls speed by. Sue thought, he CAN'T mean it! And she knew he did. She edged a little away from him. A man who takes money from a girl.... This is going to cure me she thought, with an odd sort of satisfaction. Now, if she could just prove that he really didn't care a rap for Sue, and was just marrying her for her money.

He was saying something about Honolulu, but she interrupted. She said, "Sue looks terrible."

"No!"

"Skin and bones. Her eyes all sunken. Really, the Deckers ought to do something about it. Make her go somewhere for a rest, or something. She's a sick girl."

He half rose in his seat, as if he were going to get off the train and run ahead of it. As if it could not get him to her quick enough.

Margaret looked out the window again. She couldn't bear it.

It was a relief to everyone when Sue finally won over the family, and she and Ken were formally engaged.

Most of the previous love trysts were held in the Wickham house, or the Wickham lawn, with Margaret determinedly loyal to Sue, and the other Wickhams determinedly loyal to Margaret, in a constant state of upheaval over it.

How they got through the winter, what with Sue's tears and ecstasies, and their own bickerings, was a marvel to all. What went on at the Deckers' could only be surmised. But in January father Decker, who had publicly announced that he'd take a shot at young Raleigh if he found him prowling around the place, and mother Decker, who had tearfully told her friends she'd rather see her baby dead in her coffin than married to a nobody like that, gave up the struggle, and ordered the wedding invitations.

"When Pops found that Ken and I didn't want a thing from him, and that we were really going to live on Ken's salary he couldn't believe it," Sue told Margaret exultingly.

"One can scarcely blame him," Margaret answered dryly, for she was thinking of Ken's little slip about hoping for an allowance, and it was impossible to think of Sue who had always had everything, doing with less.

"Ken is so high minded," Sue rattled on, "he couldn't bear to think of me going without things and he wanted me to wait and go East first with Moms—she's going to New York and, unless Pops is mean about it, to Europe for six months, because she was so disappointed we didn't get to Japan."

"Oh—you're going then?"

"Moms is, I'm not. I'm marrying Ken in April. I was going to marry him whether Pops gave his consent or not, but when he saw I really meant it and Ken wouldn't take a nickel from him, why he pulled in his horns. And when he found out that we're going to live on $100 a month—"

Margaret thought of the eighteen a week that she and Ken had planned to live on. But that was two years ago, things had changed since then. She said, "That isn't very much, Sue. Besides, I should think that if his father took him into the business he could afford to pay him more than that."

"Yes, wouldn't you? But you can't do anything with him, he's an ignorant old thing you know. And it will be fun. Anyway, when Pops saw that it was all true love and he couldn't stop it why he said he'd see we had a decent wedding anyway, and he'd give us a house, and I said all right, we'd take that much. Just a little house because I'm going to do all my own work—"

"But you don't know HOW! How can you possibly—"

"Oh, it's easy. I can learn. And what I really came over to tell you is that I want you for bridesmaid. Just you. Nobody else. It's going to be awfully nice, and terribly simple. Me in chalk white, princess style, with yards of veil and Madonna lilies, and you in green."

"But, Sue, you know I work, and I don't see how I—"

"Now listen, Maggie, you'll have an enormous blond straw hat, with streamers and daisies.... I want it in the garden, just terribly. But suppose it rains?"

"It won't rain!" How could it rain, when Sue wanted sunshine? Didn't she get everything? EVERYTHING?

Sue might intend to lead the simple life on $100 a month, but that didn't prevent her from spending several thousand of her father's money on a trousseau.

Exultantly, she dragged out much of the loot to show to Ken ahead of time. "Looky—a camel's hair coat—so I can have something to put on five years from now—because, honey, we'll NEVER be able to buy any clothes. And this pair of silver foxes, I'll look dressy in them over my kitchen aprons. Aren't I the clever fixer!"

Margaret, helping with the wedding invitations, scowled over Mrs. Decker's address book. Undoubtedly Sue was being smart to get so many things that would last indefinitely, but why brag about it to Ken? Why keep reminding him he couldn't buy her anything?

They were always forgetting her, and discussing their most intimate plans when she couldn't help but hear. It was embarrassing and it made her want to shake Sue.

They were at it again. Sue was saying, "I'll scrub and sew and wash and cook for you, sweetheart, and we'll live on hamburger and beans, but you must cut out drinking and smoking, and so will I, and—"

"I'm not going to give up smoking, and I don't spend enough on drinking to make any difference. Besides, you don't want to give up smoking yourself!"

"I do!"

"Why?"

"Because we're going to be poor!"

"A hundred a month isn't much. I'll admit, but people do live on it pretty decently, especially when they don't have to pay rent, and we won't if your father buys a house for us. My mother sets a fine table on very little money—"

"If you're comparing ME to your mother—"

Sue began angrily. "Well, if you two are going to fight, I'm going home. It's late anyway," Margaret said, slipping an elastic band around her addressed envelopes, and preparing to leave.

"I'll walk home with you," Ken said. But she had to wait, uncomfortably, while they billed and cooed and said goodnight. And it hurt, that Sue, the jealous, didn't mind Ken walking home with her in the dark of an April night.

The scene depicted a church, a miniature bride and groom leaving the church, and a house on the hill. Miss Benninger was presented a card bearing the names of the staff members and a poem which told her where to find her gift. The gift of silver was concealed in the centerpiece.

Theatre Attractions

Pa Jones has let himself in for a peck of trouble, and there are bushels of fun and excitement as the whole family pitch in to help him out in "Down On the Farm," latest of the delightful Jones Family series, showing Wednesday only at the State theatre.

The excitement starts when Dad helps Roger with one of his chemistry experiments in the cellar, and the disastrous results compel the whole family to enjoy the hospitality of Aunt Ida's farm while their home is being repaired.

The Joneses are welcomed to this peaceful haven by Aunt Ida and Cyrus, the hired hand, but the tranquility of the place is soon shattered when Jack careens through a fence on a runaway tractor and Dad samples some of Cyrus' "corn."

Hold Corn Huskin'
The selection of Aunt Ida's farm as the site for a corn-huskin' contest is the signal for more fun. Pa boastfully recalls his prowess as champion corn husker in his younger days and proceeds to train Cyrus for the event. Through a misunderstanding, however, Pa himself is hailed as the entry.

The townsfolk send a delegation down to encourage Pa and the fun and hilarity gather momentum as they nominate him for state senator on the strength of the ensuing publicity.

Bets are placed by enthusiastic supporters and quickly covered by Pa's political rivals, who hope to discredit him if he loses. Pa tries futilely to explain, but is overwhelmed by the mounting acclaim. In the opposing political camp, the leaders are worried and plot to stop him at any cost.

Pa Trains
Meanwhile, despite Pa's protests, he is forced into training as the contest develops into an event of state-wide importance.

The picture reaches its climax on the day of the contest, when Pa Jones, kidnapped and subsequently rescued by two of the youngsters, scores a complete triumph in the corn huskin' contest with the entire family and Cyrus helping out.

The familiar Jones family of Jed Prouty, Spring Byington, Russell Gleason, Ken Howell, George Ernest, June Carlson, Florence Roberts and Billy Mahan has been augmented by Louise Fazenda as Aunt Ida, Eddie Collins as Cyrus, and Dorris Bowdon.

Long Flight Ends In Manila Harbor

MANILA, Dec. 6.—Unable to hold altitude after one of its four motors stalled, the big German Condor monoplane made a forced landing and sank in Manila harbor today as it neared the end of a non-stop flight from Tokyo. Its crew of five and one passenger were uninjured.

Heinz Junge, director of the Focke-Wulf airplane plant and passenger aboard the ship which recently completed a goodwill flight from Berlin to Tokyo, was brought to Manila in a commercial amphibian plane sent to the scene. He refused to discuss the mishap except to say the plane encountered fuel line trouble.

The plane had flown from Tokyo in 10 hours and 53 minutes.
